Academic Program Overview

Anesthesiology is a specialty that blends science, problem-solving, and teamwork, and it plays a part in nearly every operation in a hospital. In this course, students learn how anesthesiologists evaluate patients before surgery, monitor them during the procedure, and manage their pain and recovery afterward.

Students will take and interpret vital signs, practice airway management on training manikins, work with IV task trainers and respond to simulated emergencies in the operating room. Working in teams, students will review a simulated patient's history and build an anesthesia care plan. The course ends with a full operating room simulation where students guide a patient through pre-op assessment, surgery and recovery.

Excursions

Students will see how anesthesia professionals train and work. They will visit the University of Michigan Clinical Simulation Center, where physicians, nurses, and medical students practice life-saving skills on high-fidelity manikins. Students will also hear from anesthesiologists, residents, and nurse anesthetists about their training, their daily work, and the many paths into the field.
